Why do some species introductions result in invasions? Why are “invasive species” not invasive everywhere? Answers may have to do with introduction pathways, with species traits, or even with evolution and local adaptation to different environments. I try to disentangle these mechanisms and show what plant invasions in Brazil suggest about the drivers of biological invasions.